

I The modern state, a place of A equality

The modern state has been shaped by the socio-cultural ~~real~~ factors existing in Europe. Democracy as we live it today is ~~a result~~ the ^{political} expression of the modern state. It is ~~The modern state~~ is anchored on the concept of citizenship. For each individual, citizenship is a status. It flows from the awareness that the sovereignty of the state has its foundation in the people taken as a whole.

Being a status, citizenship conveys also a legal position: it expresses the equality of men + women before the law. B But let us look, for instance, at ~~the situation of w.~~ ~~that~~ for many decades in the modern state 50% of its population was kept outside ~~the~~ equality! ~~It~~ ~~did~~ it have the basic rights of citizenship.

This case points out to the fact that in the evolution of democracy, the social + cultural values dominant in each epoch conditioned its expression. So much so that in the case of ~~the~~ ^{w.} there was contradiction between the principle of universality of rights of democracy and ~~their~~ ^{its} practical application.

Such factors belong to ^a ~~such~~ ^c given period in history. They can change but are often perceived for a long time as being part + parcel of democracy as a concept.

The case about w's citizenship raises also another question. In many constitutions one article refuses the idea of any discrimination and states the equality before the law.

But, at every ~~point~~ ^{period} of history, we have to ask ourselves: which law?

The law follows, to some extent, D the evolution of social life. —
It doesn't elaborate principles, guarantees or freedoms alien to the experience of collective life of people, of their relations + mutual accountability.

This means that the equality before the law is subject to the way society sees itself: self-understanding of society in each period gives to the equality before the law renewed contents.

Again, the socio-cultural realities precede + shape the law.

Those socio-cultural E realities which give shape to democracy are not ~~analyzed~~ and with sufficiently analyzed.

In the last 100 years, there have ~~been~~ ^{took place} in Europe spectacular ~~changes~~ ^{events} in the social + economic ~~order~~ realities. They influenced the identity of the modern state and contributed decisively to the geo-political position of each State.

~~How~~ ~~In spite of all this,~~ And yet, Europe has kept with obstinacy its democracies at the level of the first rights + jus_ stitutions and within F the framework of the socio-cultural realities of the beginning of democracy in the modern state.

Democracy + develop/ - two sides of the same reality

• Civic + political rights as a basis for democracy

Civic + political rights were, for many decades, the expression of citizenship.

Thus, for a long time, democracy in Europe was divorced from other rights which were gaining shape as a result of the socio-cultural transformations which took place in many countries.

There are in the modern state 2 parallel currents.

One covenant is concerned ~~it~~ with the fundamental guarantees + freedoms, is ~~not~~ spelled out in all Constitutions and remains the measure of a democratic regime.

The other covenant appears often at a second level, within the frame of another logic. Its components are not called upon ~~to~~ for the definition of the democratic ideal. I am speaking of the rights which are demanded by the new organization of individual + social life as brought ~~by~~ about by industrialization + correlated phenomena.

It is a perplexing fact that I such a covenant has not been incorporated in the foundation of democracy. (Related to the fact that only now the "public policies", the performance of governments are the object of political science.)

Together with industrialization came uncontrolled urbanization, literacy of ~~popular~~^{the} masses, mass-media as part of cultural life, need of protection against work accidents, etc. However, European democracies have marginalised those facts which, paradoxically, were at the basis of its strength in the world.

(2 Pachs)

Taken by a rigid concept, Europe evolved a concept of democracy (for itself + for countries in other continents) in which democracy is equated with the respect for all civic + political rights + with the institutionalization of the mechanisms needed to safeguard such rights. J

The political discourse of Europeans - at the level of the State + its organs as at the level of great party-groups - shows clearly that philosophy.

Emergence of social, economic + cultural rights K

With industrialization the modern state is linked with technology. This leads to new demands for the individual, the society + the State.

Industrialization was ~~dis~~ looked upon as an extension of man's capacity to master nature.

Gradually it became clear that the macro-social effects of industrialization meant, in their turn, the rights of man as individual.

Hence the beginning of the formulation of social + economic + ^{cultural} rights. They are an expression of the demand put before the State by the individuals to protect them in the new conditions created by the ~~new~~ industrialization.

Economic rights appear as the ↳ demand made by fertile populations fleeing the countryside + deprived of their traditional agricultural resources. They aim at regulating the economic activity. (USA)

Social rights are a typical European phenomenon. They are the aftermath of the economic situation. Thus we see successively, protection of motherhood, night-work, paid ^{regular} holidays, today they cover all the ~~dis~~ contributions of ~~the~~ the work-life cycle of each individual person. This ^{justit.} security is what we know today as the welfare

Cultural rights is their complete form are recent (though the right of compulsory education existed in most European countries). They express the priority of spiritual values over the material values of existence.

The existence of this type of rights ^H
+ the institutionalized answer to them created what is called as welfare Stt.

It is not only the exponential expenses which are at stake. It is the very concept of the social rights which is challenged. ~~to~~ They have appeared as a corrective of the difficulties encountered in the work pattern of the industrialized world. Though fulfilling a role of security for people, it is not any more in the linkage to work that social rights find their legitimacy.

They tend to be seen as an autonomous category, springing forth from the right to live. New structures are needed which have to be thought away from the link to work. Let us then be clear that the welfare Stt is at stake not only for budgetary reasons but because^N of the new phase of the relation industrialization to Society.

A // difficulty is found in what concerns cultural rights.

The linear rationality of economics tends to put cultural rights at the end of the ^{State} public budget. Again new forms are needed.

We have to state that citizenship has been enlarged in these last 50 to 100 years. The social/econ/cult rights of the individual are, together with civic + political rights part + parcel of democracy.

All the conceptual work needed remains to be done. Europe has to think its own development, has to give societal goals to its political process.

Though ~~incorporation~~ taking into account a geo-strategic factor, former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt states clearly in his book -- that it is imperative for Europe to think its goals + to create the necessary mechanisms. A strategy is needed to guide the actors + corresponding actors is imperative.

This is today the great challenge Europe is facing. Otherwise, speaking of employment, will remain a vague utopia. Such a massive problem can only be faced in the context of a global strategy for Europe.

Political system where delegation^e of power passes through soc via technology + media.

A second challenge is ~~being~~ ^{before} Europe + encompasses some of the new issues that have come up sharply on this continent.

Let us be honest from the outset: we are looking towards the xxi century with the same frame of reference of the best rep of industrialization (from xviii cent. end of ii ww).

The ~~represent~~ delegation of power of the representative democracy didn't go much further than widening the scope of the traditional participation of the peasant in the decisions concerning his village. One man is chosen to represent the interests at state and life goes on.

The industrial era left, in the representative system, the consequences of opposing economic interests in the production cycle. There was enough potential in the technical process to answer to such conflicts. However, such clashes were transformed into ideologies. From the technical process + from the industrial world, these ideologies went overboard & as to encompass all aspects of society and the behaviour of all social groups.

Hence the perplexity before the decisions of the electoral body:

- the proletarians of yesterday are the petite bourgeoisie of today;
- the poor, in name of their rights, reject in many European countries, the foreigners who came to do the work they don't want to do anymore;

— the very goals defined by ^R the political leaders are almost irrelevant in electoral sociology

~~it is we can see there that it is~~ the match struggle which counts.

Several factors contribute to this paradoxical behaviour.

Opinion polls, face-to-face debate on TV ~~among~~ between political candidates make of politics another show in a time of mass-media events.

Fundação Cuidar o Futuro

At every stage, the political project of the candidates, as well as the decision-making of the electorate are conveyed by the media through technological means.

Of course, technical means + tools represent evolution + progress in the understanding of the masses' behaviour.

But we can ask:

- is there still any possibility for the individuals to choose or ~~this~~ is their thinking totally conditioned by the technical means geared to the masses?
- have the masses a will?

Fundação Cuidar o Futuro

Modern culture has been unable to encompass science + technology. There are no cultural codes to enable the individual to face the new language of technology.

This is the huge phenomenon of modern illiteracy expressing itself in new forms of ignorance.

In such a context, the citizen I loses the root of his freedom in the exercise of civic + political rights.

Therefore, one of the main tasks of today is the capacity to encompass, in the general movement of culture, science + technology. It is up to culture totally of our time, having understood the new tools we are working with or which are working on us, to help men + w to become again subject in the process of social + political evolution.

It is the complexity of modern time which is at stake here.

We may even consider that 4 Europe needs to assume fully the logics of automation of all infra-structures of society. The more basic infra-structures will acquire a required degree of automation, the freer the citizens will be for imaginative tasks of innovation & full exercise of responsibility.

It is why Europe is facing new ways of structuring the basic forms of citizenship.
New forms of social organization won't fail to have consequences on the political level.
