

Citaat uit: Erik H. Erikson - Insight and Responsibility (Lectures on the ethical implications of psychoanalytic insight by the author of "Childhood and Society" and "Young Man Luther")

" Before Freud, man (that is, man of the male sex and of the better classes) was convinced that he was fully conscious of all there was to him, and sure of his divine values. Childhood was a mere training ground, in charge of that intermediary race, women.

In such a world female hysteria was implicitly acknowledged by men and men doctors as a symptom of the natural inferiority, the easy degeneracy, of women. When Freud presented to the Vienna Medical Society a case of male hysteria, the reaction of his colleagues convinced him that years of isolation lay ahead of him. He accepted it then and there: he never visited that society again." (p. 28)

Lieve Trees,

Mag het even zo op dit informele papiertje. Ik stuur jou het citaat maar, dan bereikt het Maria vanzelf. - Bij Haarsma heb ik nog even naar de datum van Berger en hem geïnformeerd: het is 10 september. Dat kun je dus nu ook verbeteren.

Veel liefs,

to Tine

Fundação Cuidar o Futuro

Breda, 11 Aug '69

Maua

*For the evening -
Love! - See*